

ABSTRACT

The subject of regional economic development is explored with particular emphasis on the role of public investment coordination in and, a matrix of the major federal programs affecting regional councils.

The central argument is that the federal government's failure to integrate and enable the effective coordination of federal programs has reduced the influence the programs have on the economic development